This past weekend, a number of University of Connecticut students visited Washington D.C. to march in a mass protest in support of Palestinian people. The rally was organized by the Palestine Youth Movement organization, a group whose mission is to advance Palestinian freedom and liberation.

Several UConn students attended this rally, most of whom are in UConn's Students for Justice in Palestine club.

One UConn graduate of the class of 2023 goes by the name Layan, who was SJP's social media chair and eventually became the club's president. She joined current UConn students in Washington D.C.

"We were able to organize buses and transportation to get UConn students to the rally, as we recognize that every single person's presence counts because mass mobilization is one of our most effective tactics to amplify our voices and shed light on our cause," Layan said.

Layan stated that this weekend's rally had more than 400,000 participants, making it the biggest rally for Palestine that the U.S. has seen.

"It was amazing," Layan said. Layan described seeing so many people in one place to protest for Palestine as surreal.

"It was so beautiful to see people of all different colors, ethnic backgrounds, religions and identities come together to fight for a common cause," Layan said. "Black and brown people and all oppressed marginalized groups across the world know that we are not free until we are all free."

Current vice president of SJP, Nour Alqaddumi, heard about the rally through other organizers and social media. They said most of UConn's SJP board attended.

"The goal of this rally was mass mobilization. It brought people from different states across the U.S. in front of the White House," Alqaddumi said. "Our allies are growing. Power is truly in the people and the more we are organized and actionable, the more we can make change in a country that has blind support for an apartheid state."

"Black and brown people and all oppressed marginalized groups across the world know that we are not free until we are all free"

LAYAN

UConn SJP has posted and protested for Palestine throughout the year. With the Israel-Palestine conflicts growing mass media attention in the past month, the club has been working tirelessly to shift the biased narrative on campus, Alqaddumi explained.

"It is important that us Palestinians and our allies fight against the propaganda that has been plaguing the media," Alqaddumi said. "We plan on creating content based on UConn's connection with the war industry that directly affects the Palestinians as well as their biased narrative."

Although Layan has graduated, she said that she still works closely with UConn SJP to shift the narrative across UConn's campuses.

"It is imperative that this kind of work continues, because UConn pours thousands of our tuition dollars into the war industry. They are direct enablers of the genocide of Palestinians, and they knowingly, despicably, have aided their murder for the past 75 years," Layan said. "UConn and the entire administration has blood on their hands, and it is up to them to wash it off. It is up to them to stand on the right side of history."

Pop-up food pantry to be held in Student Union ballroom

On Wednesday, Nov. 8, starting at 10 a.m., University of Connecticut Dining Services will host a pop-up food pantry until either 1 p.m. or when supplies run out, whichever comes first. The pantry, run through Husky Harvest, is to be held in the Student Union ballroom (room 331) and is open to anyone with a UConn ID.

Husky Harvest requests that students who attend have their UConn IDs ready for the check-in table and to bring their own bags if they have them. Those in attendance should prepare for the possibility of significant lines for food and should plan accordingly.

The pop-up food pantry is in collaboration with Husky Harvest, which organizes food drives and pantries for food-insecure students across the state. These pantries "provide the campus community with non-perishable food items, toiletries, and more," as listed on the Husky Harvest website.

Options for food "will vary on each campus based on what is available from Connecticut Foodshare, Midwest Food Bank New England, and what recent donations are received."

Weekly Husky Harvest food pantries are scheduled each week at the Charter Oak Apartments' Community Center 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. on Mondays and Thursdays.

The pop-up pantry comes alongside Husky Harvest's November donation drive for "Canned Goods & Dry Goods," which includes items like cereal, pasta, soups, chili, beans and others. Students are additionally encouraged to provide reusable grocery bags, either in new or gently used condition.

Husky Harvest requests that those interested in donating should not drop off their goods at the Community Center or Wednesday's pantry, but rather in existing designated drop-off locations. These locations include the UConn Dining Commissary at 30 Gurleyville Road, open from 6 a.m. to 4 p.m. Monday through Friday, and the UConn Dining Main Office in the Wade Building of Towers Residence Halls, open from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. Monday through Friday.

More information on UConn food pantries on campus can be found at www.husky-

harvest.uconn.edu, while a full list of items acceptable for the November donation drive can be found at www.dining.uconn.edu/2023/10/10/husky-harvest-wish-list/. Students with questions or comments regarding UConn's Husky Harvest Food Pantries can direct them to www.dining.uconn.edu/questions-and-comments/.

Tuesday's elections will be shaped by the politics of abortion. Here are the major races to watch

An attendee to a candidates forum reviews the event program that list those people seeking a statewide office in the November 7 election, in addition to a reminder of the general election and the general runoff of Nov. 28, in Vicksburg, Miss., on Oct. 26, 2023.

(AP) — Several states will participate in Tuesday's off-year general election that will determine the next governor in two states and provide insight into how abortion rights are shaping American politics.

Voters in Kentucky will decide whether to give a second term to Gov. Andy Beshear, a Democrat running in a heavily Republican state. In Mississippi, Republican Gov. Tate Reeves is seeking reelection against a cousin of rock 'n' roll legend Elvis Presley.

In those races and others across the country, access to abortion has been a frequent topic in campaign debates. Ohio voters will decide on a constitutional amendment supported by abortion rights groups and both Democrats and Republicans have campaigned for control of Virginia's legislature by arguing the other party is wrong on abortion.

Here's a look at Tuesday's major races.

Kentucky governor

Beshear seeks a second term in a heavily Republican state Donald Trump carried twice. The GOP nominee is Daniel Cameron, who succeeded Beshear as state attorney general.

Beshear has called the state's restrictive abortion law "extremist" for not allowing exceptions in cases of rape and incest. He also vetoed a proposal banning abortions after 15 weeks. Cameron says he supports the state law and that as governor he would sign a bill amending it to allow rape and incest exceptions. But at times he has had difficulty clarifying what exceptions he favors.

Beshear, the son of former two-term Democratic Gov. Steve Beshear, was first elected in 2019 when he defeated GOP incumbent Matt Bevin by less than half a percentage point. Cameron is a former aide to U.S. Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell and endorsed by Trump. If elected, he would become the first Black Republican governor since Reconstruction.

Ohio constitutional amendment on abortion

Ohio voters will decide whether to amend the state Constitution to protect access to abortion services.

The measure would establish the right to "make and carry out one's own reproductive decisions" on matters including abortion, contraception and fertility treatment. It would also allow for abortions to be banned once it has been established that the fetus can survive outside of the womb, unless a physician determines that continuing with the pregnancy would endanger the patient's "life or health."

In August, voters rejected a measure that would have made it more difficult to approve Tuesday's abortion proposal. That contest was seen as a proxy fight on reproductive rights and received national attention.

Virginia General Assembly Control of both chambers of Virginia's state legislature is up for grabs, with Republicans holding a narrow majority in the state House and Democrats leading the state Senate. Either or both chambers could flip and possibly give Republicans full control of state government. That would clear the way for Republican Gov. Glenn Youngkin to implement a ban on abortions after 15 weeks with exceptions for rape, incest and when the mother's life is endangered. Democratic candidates have campaigned heavily on the issue.

In addition to the three marquee races in Kentucky, Ohio and Virginia, the Associated Press will report vote totals and winners in 346 contested races in 12 states. Here are some other notable races to watch:

Mississippi governor

Reeves is running for a second term against Democrat Brandon Presley, a state utility regulator and cousin of Elvis Presley. Democrats held the Mississippi governorship for almost all of the 20th century, but Republicans have controlled the office for the last 20 years. With help from a sizable cash infusion from the national party, Presley out-raised Reeves this year and essentially matched him in spending, but the incumbent entered the final stretch of the campaign with more money.

Reeves was first elected in 2019 with 52% of the vote. Both chambers of the state legislature are also up for election.

Pennsylvania Supreme Court Republican Carolyn Carluccio and Democrat Daniel McCaffery are the nominees to fill a vacant state Supreme Court seat that could play a significant role on voting-related cases during the 2024 presidential campaign.

Rhode Island U.S. House District 1

Democrat Gabe Amo and Republican Gerry Leonard face off in a special election to complete the term of former Democratic U.S. Rep. David Cicilline, who resigned in May after seven terms. The district has voted reliably for Democrats. Cicilline was first elected in 2010 and won his last five reelection bids with 60% of the vote or higher. Democrat Patrick Kennedy previously held the seat for 16 years.

Mayors

In Houston, 17 candidates are vying to replace term-limited Mayor Sylvester Turner. Notable hopefuls include U.S. Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee and state Sen. John Whitmire, both Democrats.

In Uvalde, Texas, where a gunman killed 19 students and two teachers at Robb Elementary School last year, the candidates for mayor are former news reporter Kimberly Mata-Rubio, whose daughter was killed in the shooting, former mayor Cody Smith and elementary school teacher Veronica Martinez.

In Bridgeport, Connecticut, Mayor Joe Ganim is seeking an eighth term, but on Wednesday, a state judge made the unusual move of ordering a re-do of the September Democratic primary after evidence surfaced of possible ballot stuffing. The date for the new primary has not been set but will take place after Tuesday's general election. AP will tabulate vote results of the Tuesday election but will not declare a winner until the legal challenges have been resolved.

In Derby, Connecticut, incumbent Mayor Richard Dziekan is running as an independent for a fourth term after losing the Republican primary to alderman Gino DiGiovanni, Jr., who was charged by federal prosecutors in August with illegally entering the U.S. Capitol during the riot on Jan. 6, 2021.

New York City Council District 9

Criminal justice reform activist Yusef Salaam, who was one of five men convicted and later exonerated in the "Central Park Jogger" rape case, is running unopposed.

Career Night

Alumns give advice to Huskies

by Fernanda Ieffet | CAMPUS CORRESPONDENT | SHE/HER/HERS | fernanda.ieffet@uconn.edu

Spring semester is right around the corner, which can only mean one thing: there are a handful of Huskies out there going crazy building resumes and working on developing communication skills. If this describes you, fellow Husky, here is some exciting news: the Center of Career and Development, along with the Alumni Center and the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences, has your back. On Monday, Nov. 6, the University of Connecticut hosted an event called Career Night, in which eight successful UConn alumni were invited to talk about their experiences, answering questions as well as providing crucial advice for students who are currently working on starting their careers.

The night began with a networking exercise among students in which they were invited to talk to each other about which alumni they were most excited to meet. They also shared which questions they were most excited to ask and what they hoped to achieve by the end of the night. This exercise was followed by a quick presentation to help those participating to further elevate their questions. The presentation outlined the importance of accurately determining whether they are looking for advice, in which case they should ask questions such as “What do you look for in a candidate?” In other circumstances, they may be seeking information, in which case the questions should be of the same nature of, for example; “What do you do on a typical day in your position?” After that, students were instructed to go to one of the eight tables, each hosting a different alumni and engage in conversations with them. Three rounds were completed, and by the end, everyone seemed to be excited about the opportunities that awaited them. It was also evident that the alums were delighted to be able to come back to what certainly is a special place for them and help the newest generations of Huskies in their promising journeys.

The group of alumni present at the event consisted of Alexander Peterkin, data analyst at WWE, Anthony Sacco, senior associate data scientist at MORSE Corporation in Boston, Anthony Tyson, post-production editor at ESPN, Chelsea Osei, Master of Public Policy Candidate at UConn, Clare Wieduwilt, ULDP underwriting senior analyst, Edgardo Rossetti, senior marketing director at Adams & Knight, Jonathan Costa, senior editor of audience engagement at ESPN and Kathleen McWilliams, director of communications for Senator Richard Blumenthal.

The night was an overall success. It is safe to say that projects of this nature are of great importance for students as they are given the opportunity to get first-hand guidance from those who have undoubtedly achieved their goals of building their careers. Huskies who were not able to attend, please do not be discouraged! Take this article as a sign to keep an eye out for further events, as UConn organizations are always promoting different events that aim to help its students. Keep working hard because who knows? Maybe you will be one of the alumni giving speeches in a few years.

UConn Alumni return for CLAS career night on Nov. 6, 2023. Students were able to network with alumni currently working in the data and communications fields.

TIK TOK VERSUS YOUR BANK ACCOUNT

by Karla Perez
ASSOCIATE LIFE EDITOR
SHE/HER/HERS
karla.perez@uconn.edu

Welcome back to Conversations with Karla! In case you missed it, last week we talked about the spread of misinformation through social media. This week, we will meet Kallista Berner, a third-semester pre-teaching major and history minor, to talk about the control social media has over our wallets.

Berner took us back to the COVID-19 pandemic, which she described as the time that TikTok influencers truly started to make their appearance. As many are aware, social media influencers make most of their profits from brand deals, which involves making content about products that companies send them, hyping them up and convincing their viewers to buy them.

This pattern of activity skyrocketed during the pandemic according to Berner. “I felt a constant need to buy stuff. It felt like I didn’t have what I ‘needed’ to have; I didn’t have the right shoes or the right skin care. Every video I watched showed a new thing I ‘needed’ to buy.”

Berner has deleted TikTok since the pandemic and shared that she feels less pressure to buy products that influencers promote simply because she doesn’t see them as often. She also explained that watching videos of influencers promoting products only had a minor effect on her self-image, but a major impact on her spending habits.

While this is a fortunate circumstance for Berner, it is not always the case for social media users. It seems that every week there is a new “it” product, and if you don’t have that product, you’re off-trend — that doesn’t sound very good to anyone. Trends regarding aesthetics have also come about in recent years. Currently, social media is obsessed with the “clean girl” look, but to achieve that look you need a specific makeup routine to get that glowy finish. Additionally, the aesthetic is thought to look the best on clear skin, which isn’t always achievable for people with acne-prone skin. To add to the dilemma, most of these makeup and skincare products are outrageously priced, excluding even more people from participating in the trend.

This likely sounds like a ridiculous thing to worry about for the average college student; however, if you look at it through the lens of a pre-teen or even adolescent, it is a bigger deal, as those are the ages where other people’s opinions of you take a greater toll.

Berner connects this feeling back to her pandemic-era behavior on social media. “During the pandemic, I feel like I was more aware of what I posted,” she said. “I used Instagram and TikTok more so I started comparing myself to other girls and influencers more.”

In today’s social media landscape, Berner has noticed more people participating in the “de-influencing” trend and putting less emphasis on the need to buy new products. Nonetheless, Berner notes that social media influencers are contributing a lot to consumerism. She said, “Once I put that into perspective, I started to think about ‘How badly do I really need that must-have top from Amazon or that brand new skin product? Is it really necessary?’”

Our conversation ended with Berner emphasizing that “We as a society need to stop allowing ourselves to be so easily influenced and feeding into consumerism when it’s not even worth it.” This is important not only for the sake of your wallet but also for the environment. We have all heard of the crisis our planet is facing, and influencing people to buy products won’t help it get any better.

That’s all for this week’s Conversations with Karla! Remember that you’re loved. See you next week when we’ll be discussing a new social media topic.

"We're going to build a wall and make Mexico pay for it!"

This heavily repeated slogan is easily the most famous, or rather infamous, quote and catchphrase associated with Donald Trump. Legions of Trump supporters across the country would repeatedly chant "Build that wall! Build that wall!" at his rallies and to anyone else who has the misfortune of listening. Hell, I remember kids in middle school chanting that in the hallways. His plan of a grand border wall became his signature policy and made him the face of a growing right wing contingent of immigration hardliners.

Despite the strong association between Trump and hardline immigration policy, the idea of building a wall at the United States-Mexico border is not unique to him at all. In reality, border wall and fence construction has been occurring since the 1990s. The idea is only so strongly associated with Trump because of him repeating "build the wall" at any chance he could. The phrase was crafted by Sam Nunberg, one of Trump's consultants, as a way to keep him on track without trailing off into ranting about "The Apprentice" or his beloved Rosie O'Donnell. The phrase became a hit among his base, but it doesn't mean that border construction is a new idea by Trump.

The modern era of border wall construction can be traced back to 1994. Facing a large wave of illegal border crossings, specifically near San Diego, Bill Clinton introduced Operation Gatekeeper, not to be confused with Operation Gaslight or Operation Girlboss. One of the provisions of the plan was to build 14 miles of border fence starting at the Pacific Ocean, where the highest level of illegal immigration was occurring. It also led to an increased militarization of the border, causing a staggering 3,800 deaths since the implementation of this plan. Despite the death toll of the plan and its implementation of border wall construction, Clinton largely escaped criticism thanks to him totally not having sexual relations with Monica Lewinsky.

The next significant action occurred during the administration of ultimate nepo baby George W. Bush. During his second term, Congress passed the Secure Fence Act of 2006, which authorized the construction of 700 miles of new border fence. This was, and still is, the largest amount of border construction ever authorized by the federal government, greatly outweighing any action Trump took on the border. It's also worth noting that the bill was bipartisan and passed by significant margins in both Houses of Congress, showing that it's not just Republicans who support border construction. By the end of Bush's tenure, more than 500 miles of border fence was constructed. But the massive plan is generally ignored in discussions about Bush, as his legacy is more defined by the War on Terror, the 2007-08 financial crisis and his general incompetence.

The implementation of the Secure Fence Act continued when Barack Obama took office in 2009. Under his administration, 128 miles of new border fence was constructed. Obama also continued the Bush-era practice of waiving federal laws regarding the environment, farmland and historic sites in order to push ahead with this construction. The continuation of the Secure Fence Act was one of many tough-on-immigration actions pursued by his administration, another of which was the deportation of roughly three million illegal immigrants, which earned him the moniker of "deporter-in-chief." Though he consistently faced criticism for his policies during his presidency, his calm, well-spoken demeanor helped prevent him from becoming the face of the anti-immigration movement.

At long last, now we finally get to Donald Trump. He rode the wave of white anger to the presidency with his brash anti-immigration rhetoric and vow to build a glorious wall. But what did he actually accomplish? The answer is not much. Under the Trump reich, only 80 new miles of border barriers were actually constructed. A vast majority of the construction that occurred under Trump focused on replacing already-existing structures and barriers at the border. And Mexico didn't pay for a dime of it, with the money instead coming from the Department of Defense's budget. Trump's construction at the border pales in comparison to the actions of his predecessors, despite him being more vocal about border construction than all of them combined. Trump bragging about the border is the equivalent of that one person in a group project who barely did anything but then slaps their name right at the top of it and brags about all the work they did, which is accurate given his massive ego.

But the story of border construction does not end with Donald Trump. Last month, Joe Biden announced the construction of 20 new miles of border barriers in Texas, a plan initially authorized by the Trump administration. Biden has come under fire for this, as he declared during his campaign that "there will never be another foot of wall constructed on my administration," yet is doing just the opposite. The new plan is also controversial because the Biden administration plans to waive 26 environmental laws in order to complete the construction, an action previously taken by the Obama administration.

In summation, construction at the southern border is not a unique idea only espoused by Trump, but rather one that has been the norm for presidential administrations for the past 30 years. Sure, Trump regularly yelled "build the wall!" at any chance he could, but the actions of the Clinton, Bush, Obama and now Biden administrations speak louder than any words that Trump said.

WHY UCONN'S INTERNATIONAL GRAD STUDENTS CAN'T "JUST HOP-ON"

by Laura Bizzarri

The University of Connecticut is utterly ignoring the transportation needs of its students, particularly international graduate students. A recent Editorial in The Daily Campus addressed concerns regarding issues with the transportation services on the Storrs campus. However, this problem is more widespread, affecting public transportation to surrounding areas as well. The truth is UConn should care more.

International graduate students represent almost a third of all the graduate program-seeking students at UConn, being a huge component of the teaching and research workforce. UConn's courses and research programs would quickly come to a halt if graduate students decided to just walk away (walking is, after all, the most efficient means of transportation we currently have).

I arrived at UConn as an international graduate student in 2017, with no money, no phone and no driver's license. I decided to live in Northwood Apartments, the only university housing available to graduate students. It was overpriced for my salary, but it was the only option that allowed me to walk to my office and classes. When I needed to get a driver's license at the DMV in Willimantic, I decided to take the bus, but I could only go on Saturday, when buses run even less frequently. I made it to the DMV, but I missed the last bus at about 12 p.m. to return to Storrs and had to call an Uber.

Many UConn international students end up living nearby in Willimantic, simply because it's the nearest town with a bus line connecting it to campus and more affordable rent prices. A mere 15-minute drive by car, it can take up to one hour for the bus to reach campus from Willimantic. Buses don't run frequently enough or at the times that most students need them and lose significant time by making stops in areas not frequented by grad students, like the Mansfield Senior Center.

In response to grad students' complaints, university officials have often suggested that the university is already doing its best by providing "free" U-Passes (not free: technically we all pay for it in the transit fee every semester). While this is helpful, passes only take us as far as the bus lines go.

UConn has a responsibility towards its international grad students. We moved away from our home countries, families and friends specifically to attend UConn. We need UConn's support in ensuring that we have access to faster and more frequent bus routes.

Laura Bizzarri is a PhD student in the department of Ecology and Evolutionary Biology at UConn.

The Rod Wave:

WHY CAM SPENCER IMPRESSED ME THE MOST IN UCONN'S WIN OVER NAU

by Evan Rodriguez
HE/HIM/HIS
ASSOCIATE SPORTS EDITOR
evanrodriguez@uconn.edu

When discussing UConn's 95-52 win over Northern Arizona, there are plenty of people who deserve credit for playing a role in the Huskies' victory. From Samson Johnson's 11 points and three blocks off the bench to Alex Karaban's career-high 22 points, there are many storylines to talk about is vast. But, out of all of those performances, Cam Spencer was my personal favorite in Monday's victory.

"For me, the best thing I saw tonight was how Cam approached it," said Dan Hurley on Spencer's contributions. "A guy with his type of credentials coming in. The scoring and all of the production in his career with his willingness to take three shots and just elevate the play of everyone around him. The impact he had on us offensively whether it was a hockey assist or the ball movement. To me, it was the story of the night."

It's hard to disagree with Connecticut's head coach when running back the tape. Spencer was excellent in more ways than one and the impact he had on UConn's offensive gameplan was tremendous. Going into this contest, we knew about the competitiveness and shooting that he brought to the table. We knew that he was going to have an immense impact on what the Huskies were going to look like this season. But, it was the little things that made his performance extra special.

I always love to see players that have the unselfish gene, a person that prioritizes the best shots over anything else. Monday night showcased that part of the transfer guard's game with a team-leading five assists throughout the contest. Spencer worked heavily to get his frontcourt mates in Johnson and Donovan Clingan involved through the pick and roll, which worked like a charm and greatly benefited the team's offensive flow. In total, Spencer contributed to 12 of Connecticut's points through his five assists, which included a Karaban three-point shot from the corner that helped the UConn offense start cookin'.

The unselfish gene doesn't just refer to his passing either. Many would've expected Spencer to take plenty of shots in his 27 minutes of action, but he instead chose to do the opposite. On Monday's final stat sheet, many would be surprised to see that Spencer took just three shots the entire night, yet it was exactly what the team needed. The scoring was able to be spread out to various players like Clingan, Tristen Newton or even newcomer Stephon and. It's the definition of what a team player is asked to do.

Yet, the Rutgers transfer contributed through more than just his passing. The action that Spencer showed on the defensive end through acts like diving for loose balls or pure defensive energy does go beyond the box score. He may have had just one steal to show for his defensive efforts on the stat sheet, but those who had the opportunity to watch the Huskies play know that the 6-foot-4-inch guard was extremely important to Monday's win.

It's pretty safe to say that Spencer is already looking like one of the most important transfers to this Huskies rotation. There is still plenty of basketball left and UConn's toughest opponents haven't been faced just yet. But, if he's able to impact games at the level that he did on Monday beyond just his scoring, Connecticut fans are going to have a lot to cheer for throughout the season.

Point/Counterpoint:

WHICH TEAM WILL GET THE NO. 4 SEED IN THE COLLEGE FOOTBALL PLAYOFFS: FLORIDA STATE OR WASHINGTON?

by Evan Rodriguez,
HE/HIM/HIS
ASSOCIATE SPORTS EDITOR,
evanrodriguez@uconn.edu
and CJ Dexter

HE/HIM/HIS CAMPUS CORRESPONDENT,
christopher.dexter@uconn.edu

There have been plenty of teams that have captivated the eyes of college football fans everywhere. From newcomers like James Madison to usual suspects like Ohio State, there's plenty to cheer for if you're a college football fan. That also means that the college football playoff race is going to heat up and two teams are in a heated battle for the No. 4 seed. Headlined by Heisman candidate Michael Penix Jr., the Washington Huskies currently stand at the No. 5 seed in the AP Top 25 with a 9-0 record to show for it. However, the team still stands behind No. 4 Florida State for a spot in the college football playoffs. This raises an interesting question. Could the Huskies manage to grab the No. 4 seed or will the Seminoles hold on for a chance at college football glory? Associate Sports Editor Evan Rodriguez and Campus Correspondent CJ Dexter will argue this question in this week's segment of point/counterpoint.

Evan: I actually had the treat of watching the Seminoles duke it out against the Pittsburgh Panthers over the weekend at Acrisure Stadium. Even without Keon Coleman and Johnny Wilson, the program stood resilient and grabbed the win 24-7. While Florida State struggled at times on both sides of the ball, the one thing to take away from this game is that this squad is still tough to beat, even when injuries may be holding them back. With that being said, I have confidence that the Seminoles can hold on to the No. 4 seed, especially if the team gets back some of their key contributors on the receiving end. When this team is healthy with Jordan Travis at the helm and weapons like Trey Benson in the backfield, they've shown that they're one of the toughest teams in college football, grabbing victories from teams like LSU and Duke. It's not going to be easy throughout the rest of the season with games against both Miami and Florida, but if the team continues to show the resiliency that I was able to witness live, I have confidence that they can keep their No. 4 spot.

CJ: There is no denying how dynamic Travis and Florida State have been this season. With their remaining schedule consisting of Miami, North Alabama and Florida, I fully believe that they will finish the season unbeaten and take down No. 11 Louisville in the ACC championship to get to 13-0. With that being said, if Penix and the Washington Huskies can get to 13-0, they should, without hesitation, get the final CFB spot (assuming Georgia, Ohio State and Michigan all make it in). The Huskies have already taken down No. 6 Oregon, No. 23 Arizona and USC this season. Additionally, they'll have three more games against resume-boosting opponents before the season ends. I have great confidence that Penix and Co. will take care of business against No. 13 Utah, No. 12 Oregon State and coast into the PAC-12 championship game against Oregon or USC. There's no doubt Washington will have a tougher time trying to get to the finish line at 13-0, but if the program succeeds at that task, it should be a seamless decision for the committee to put the Huskies in over the Seminoles. Florida State currently has one win against an AP Top 25 opponent and will have just one more chance to grab another in the ACC championship. Washington currently has two wins against AP Top 25 opponents and will have three more chances to tally that number even higher. It's less likely that Washington gets to 13-0 due to their grueling remaining schedule. But if the Huskies run the table, they should without a doubt get favored over the Seminoles in the CFB playoff selection.

Evan: The Huskies have certainly had an insane run thus far and there's no doubt about that. Regardless of what happens, you have to admit that Penix himself has had an absolutely legendary season. As for the criteria for Washington, both wins over Oregon and Arizona are undoubtedly impressive, but the win over USC is not as impressive considering that the Trojans defense had not been great before Alex Grinch's firing. When you combine that with an offensive superstar in Penix opposing USC's shaky defensive effort, the odds don't spell well for the program. Furthermore, other than the team's win over Oregon, I wouldn't say Washington's run has been vastly more impressive than Florida State's. Even discussing some of the unranked opponents that the Seminoles have beaten, the program has a win over Clemson, who just beat No. 22 Notre Dame. Additionally, I don't disagree that it's going to be tough not to admit Washington if they win out against two ranked opponents, though, that's a huge "if." Oregon State and Utah are both great programs and specifically with the Beavers, that's going to be a Pac-12 road game for Penix and Co. It's going to be a battle for the program and if the Huskies end up dropping just a single game, it will be all but decided for Florida State. Finally, if the Seminoles go into the ACC championship with their entire offensive core healthy, I have confidence that the team not only will win against No. 11 Louisville, but it may not even be close. When you take all those factors into account, I think the committee will narrowly give the edge to Florida State in this one.

Zion Tupuola-Fetui gets ready before his game against USC on November 5. Washington would end up winning this game and their record would go to 9-0.

CJ: There is no doubt that if Washington should lose one game, they will take a backseat to Florida State in the CFB Playoff rankings. But Washington has what it takes to win out and submit a bolstered resume to the CFB playoff selection committee. In addition to having the Heisman Trophy favorite at quarterback, the Huskies have one of the best wide receivers in the nation in Rome Odunze, who is fifth in the nation in receiving yards and is projected to go in the first round of the 2024 NFL Draft. In addition to Penix and Odunze, running back Dillon Johnson's absurd six yards-per-carry adds another layer to this high-flying offense. Defensively, the Huskies have allowed 28.5 points per game in conference play, which isn't good. But, the offense has been unstoppable with 509 yards and 41.7 points per game, which are both good for fourth in the FBS. I don't see anyone slowing down this offense and should they finish 13-0, a spot in the college football playoff will be waiting for them.

PREVIEWING THE 5 BEST NON-UCONN NON-CONFERENCE GAMES THIS SEASON

by Sam Calhoun

HE/HIM/HIS STAFF WRITER
samuel.calhoun@uconn.edu

College basketball is back in action, picking up the craziness that the sport left us off with in April. On opening day, James Madison upset No. 4 Michigan State, Princeton shocked Rutgers and Louisville nearly lost to UMBC.

Even though this week is not loaded with highly anticipated matchups, it's time to look at some of the best non-conference games we will see this season. While UConn's non-conference schedule includes some of the best teams in the country, this article will focus on the other massive battles between national championship contenders that could meet again in the NCAA Tournament.

No. 12 Arizona at No. 2 Duke (Friday, 7 p.m., ESPN2)

Arizona does not have All-Pac-12 forward Aзуolas Tubelis anymore, who averaged 19.8 points and 9.1 rebounds per game last season. The defending Pac-12 Tournament champions are strong, with All-Pac-12 center Omar Ballo returning. He will go up against preseason ACC Player of the Year Kyle Filipowski as the Wildcats take on Duke on Friday at Cameron Indoor Stadium. Both teams have a strong backcourt. Arizona's starting guards are North Carolina transfer Caleb Love and preseason Pac-12 Honorable Mention Pelle Larsson. The Blue Devils are deep this season, especially in the backcourt. Tyrese Proctor and Jeremy Roach do not receive enough love, as they have made a significant impact throughout their collegiate careers. Duke has a talented freshman class, led by guards Jared McCain and Caleb Foster. It's a rematch of the 2001 National Championship Game, where the Blue Devils earned their third banner.

No. 1 Kansas vs. No. 16 Kentucky (in Chicago, Tuesday, 9:30 p.m., ESPN)

I would have put the Duke-Michigan State game here, but considering the Spartans' loss to James Madison, the second game of the State Farm Champions Classic replaces that one. Kansas is loaded this season, with one of the best players in college basketball in Michigan transfer Hunter Dickinson. Alongside him is preseason All-Big 12 guard Dajuan Harris Jr., creating an unstoppable backcourt on paper with three-time All-Big 12 guard Kevin McCullar Jr. It's a blue-blood battle in the Windy City as the Jayhawks take on Kentucky. With the fans

Zach Edey lays the ball up on Opening Night for Purdue in a game against Samford on November 5. Edey is looking to lead his team to success after losing in the first round in historic fashion last season.

in Lexington questioning Hall of Fame head coach John Calipari, the Wildcats will be a very interesting team to follow this season. Kentucky will have preseason first-team All-SEC guard Antonio Reeves return for his final season. In the backcourt, Reeves will be paired with five-star first-year Justin Edwards, who was named to the All-SEC Second Team. Much like the Arizona-Duke game, this is also a rematch of a national championship game, as the Wildcats defeated Kansas in 2012. Since 2019, the results have alternated each time they have met, with the Jayhawks winning in January last season.

No. 3 Purdue vs. No. 11 Gonzaga (in Honolulu, Nov. 20, 5 p.m., ESPN2)

Reigning national player of the year Zach Edey returned to West Lafayette in hopes of helping Purdue bounce back from their historic first-round exit last season. Also returning is sharpshooter guard Fletcher Loyer, who was named to the preseason Jerry West Award Watch List (nation's best shooting guard). They will take on Gonzaga in the quarterfinal round of the Maui Jim Maui Invitational. These two teams met last year, as the Boilermakers blew the doors off the Zags in the semifinal round of last season's Phil Knight Legacy Tournament. Drew Timme isn't the face of the Bulldogs anymore. There isn't a clear star in Spokane, but head coach Mark Few's team has a threatening trio of forwards Graham Ike and Anton Watson, along with Creighton transfer guard Ryan Nembhard, one of the nation's best true point guards.

No. 19 North Carolina vs. No. 16 Kentucky (in Atlanta Dec. 16, 5:30 p.m., CBS/Paramount+)

There are not two bluer blue bloods than North Carolina and Kentucky, so it is always a must-watch when they meet in the NCAA Tournament or the CBS Sports Classic, the latter being the site of this season's battle. We've already previewed Kentucky, in its first season without former Wooden Award winner Oscar Tshiebw, with a talented backcourt of Edwards and Reeves. North Carolina was last season's preseason No. 1 before failing to make the NCAA Tournament in head coach Hubert Davis's second year as Roy Williams' successor. College basketball has many talented bigs, including UNC's Armando Bacot, a first-team All-ACC player in back-to-back seasons. While Love has transferred out of Chapel Hill, the backcourt will now have preseason Naismith Trophy Watch List guard R.J. Davis leading the way. The Tar Heels are not limited to just those two, as Stanford transfer Harrison Ingram was named to the Julius Erving Award Watch List (nation's best small forward).

They also have the ACC Preseason Rookie of the Year in five-star guard Elliot Cadeau, who will join Davis in the backcourt.

No. 11 Gonzaga at No. 16 Kentucky (Feb. 10, 4 p.m., CBS/Paramount+)

The college basketball world was ecstatic when the news came this past summer that Gonzaga and Kentucky would meet in a home-and-home series, first in Lexington this February. We've already previewed both teams, so let's focus on the short history between the two programs. In a semi-home game for the Bulldogs, taking place last November, the Zags defeated the Wildcats by 16 points. That was the second-ever meeting between the two programs, with the first coming during the 2002 Maui Invitational. Kentucky won that game, so the series is all even at one game apiece. While most teams will be deep into conference play at the time, this one will be a must-watch.

Roundtable:

WHO'S THE NFL'S BIGGEST MIDSEASON WINNER?

NFL fans, we have finally reached the halfway mark of the season! It has been a long road to get here, but with plenty of storylines to talk about, one of those happens to be the amount of winners. While teams like the Bears and Giants have been putrid to say the least, rosters like the Chiefs and Jaguars have withstood the test of time and look to stay strong going into the second half of the season. With that being said, our team of writers look to answer the question of who is the biggest midseason winner of the NFL season in this week's edition of the Daily Campus roundtable.

by Evan Rodriguez | ASSOCIATE SPORTS EDITOR | HE/HIM/HIS | evanrodriguez@uconn.edu

Houston Texans

It may be absurd to call the Texans the biggest midseason winner thus far, especially when the squad is just 4-4 and two games behind Jacksonville for first in the AFC South. But, the fact that the team finally has some stability at the quarterback position for the first time since Deshaun Watson's departure from Houston is a gigantic win for this franchise. C.J. Stroud has easily been the best rookie quarterback in 2023 and is continuing to set all kinds of records in his first NFL season. When you add the fact that the roster has managed to grab wins over some tough teams like the Jaguars and the Steelers, that's big for what this team could look like as time goes on. In terms of the pure definition of winning, this team may not fit that criteria, but in comparison to their performance prior this season, they've gotta be on the list of biggest midseason winners.

by Cole Stefan | SENIOR COLUMNIST | HE/HIM/HIS | cole.stefan@uconn.edu

Sam LaPorta

Every year, there is always one player whose rookie campaign goes under the radar because a first-year quarterback becomes a franchise cornerstone or a wide receiver explodes for a 1,000-yard campaign. Wide receivers Drake London and George Pickens' first professional season went largely unnoticed behind those of Garrett Wilson and Chris Olave in 2022, but Sam LaPorta takes the cake in 2023. Through eight games, six of them starts, the second-round NFL Draft selection ranks second on the Detroit Lions with 434 receiving yards on 43 catches and has found the end zone a team-best four times. Although it is highly unlikely that he becomes the first tight end with a 1,000-yard rookie season since Kyle Pitts two years ago, LaPorta possesses significant value as a No. 2 receiving option for a balanced Detroit offense led by quarterback Jared Goff. The 2016 first overall pick crossed the 4,000-yard mark for the third time in his career last year, but the Iowa product will be the reason he throws for 5,000+ yards in 2023.

by Gavin Freidman | CAMPUS CORRESPONDENT | HE/HIM/HIS | gavin.freidman@uconn.edu

Puka Nacua

The Los Angeles Rams truly found a diamond in the rough in the fifth round of the 2023 NFL draft. They drafted Puka Nacua with the 177th overall pick and he has already broken several records in his first nine games of the season. Nacua recorded 39 receptions and 501 yards in his first four games which were both NFL records for a player in his first four games. Through nine games the 22-year-old is also on pace to break the single-season records for the most receptions and receiving yards by a rookie. Nacua's production has taken a bit of a hit the past two games, only recording a combined six catches for 75 yards. However, this is most likely the result of the absence of Rams starting quarterback Matthew Stafford, who suffered a thumb injury in the second quarter of the Rams' Week 8 matchup against the Dallas Cowboys. Stafford has a good chance of returning in Week 11, which would give Nacua a good opportunity to continue to add to his historic rookie season.

by CJ Dexter | CAMPUS CORRESPONDENT | HE/HIM/HIS | christopher.dexter@uconn.edu

Sam Howell

Drafted in the fifth round in 2022, Washington Commanders quarterback Sam Howell wasn't expected to amount to anything more than a backup. In his rookie season, Howell was the third stringer behind Carson Wentz and Taylor Heinicke but head coach Ron Rivera decided to roll the dice with the second-year quarterback going into the 2023 campaign. Through nine starts, Howell has aired it out for 2471 yards and 14 touchdowns despite playing behind a disaster of an offensive line. The franchise was expected to be uncompetitive this year and draft a quarterback in the first round in the next NFL draft. Based on the way Howell has played in his first season, the franchise could change their plans to build around the 23-year-old from Waynesville, North Carolina. As of recent, Howell has thrown for 325+ yards with one or fewer interceptions in three of his last five games and has the Commanders just one game under .500. The former North Carolina star has turned heads so far this season and I wouldn't be surprised if this Washington team is in the wild card hunt going into the final weeks of the season.

Women's Basketball NO. 2 HUSKIES OPEN SEASON AGAINST DAYTON

by Stratton Stave
HE/HIM/HIS SPORTS EDITOR
stratton@uconn.edu

Roughly 26 years ago, UConn women's basketball head coach Geno Auriemma was recruiting Tamika Williams-Jeter, a heralded recruit, to come play for his Huskies. At the time, Connecticut had just one national championship to their name and fewer resources than many of the other schools recruiting the forward.

"When we were recruiting Tamika, that was a great memory," Auriemma recalled. "I remember when you could send a plane to go get people back in the day. A lot of the big schools thought they were ahead of the game because they would send an airplane to pick you up and fly you for an official visit. She was all excited about that happening at some of the other schools, so I mailed her one of those airplanes you put together with cardboard and said 'I'm sending the plane for you.'"

That paper airplane was enough to convince Williams-Jeter to attend school in Storrs, Connecticut, where she proceeded to win championships in 2000 and 2002 behind career averages of 10 points and five rebounds. And the airplane? Williams-Jeter's mom still has it. Now, all these years later, Williams-Jeter is the head coach of her hometown Dayton Flyers' women's basketball team, who comes to Hartford, Connecticut for UConn's season opener Wednesday.

In Williams-Jeter's first year, the Flyers took many steps back from their 26-6 campaign the season before. They lost their first 10 games and didn't pick up a Division I victory until January. They closed the year with seven wins to their name, making it to the second round of the Atlantic 10 tournament.

One of the bright spots of last season's team was Mariah Perez, a graduate student who had a breakout campaign. She averaged 12 points and nine boards, which was enough to gain her the team's most-improved player honors. This year, Perez was tabbed to the A-10 third team.

First-year center Eve Fiala is also a player to look out for in the matchup. Fiala, from Indiana, Pennsylvania, is 6 foot, 4 inches tall and garnered high-major offers while being recruited. In particular, she looked at Ohio State while Williams-Jeter was an assistant there. Fiala decided to follow her to Dayton, where she is set to be a key player from early on, thanks to her size. Her and fellow first year forward Riley Rismiller are the only two players on the roster above 6-foot-2-inches.

For UConn, they're coming off a dominant exhibition against Southern Connecticut State. The Huskies didn't allow more than 12 points in a quarter and displayed their excellent depth. No one was on the floor for more than 23 minutes, but the most electric player was in for just 12.

That player is Paige Bueckers, who notched seven points, seven assists and four rebounds on 3-4 shooting. She made the most of each moment and was particularly impressive as a distributor. It's easy to get caught up in exhibition results, but Bueckers looked great. She hopes to be in line for her first fully healthy season since her first year and will likely increase her minutes against Dayton.

Another player worth looking out for is Aaliyah Edwards, an AP third-team All-American last year. Edwards has full control of the team's frontcourt and is potentially in position for a more prolific senior year. The Huskies appear to be running a smaller lineup with wing Caroline Ducharme stepping in the starting five for graduating center Dorka Juhász. That leaves Edwards as the tallest in the rotation at 6-foot-3-inches, giving her all the opportunities down low, which combines nicely with her evolving game outside the paint.

Ducharme is the last Husky to keep an eye on, another player who suffered mightily from injuries last year. This ultimately led to a worse sophomore season, after she scored 10 per game as a first-year. In the exhibition, Ducharme tallied 10 points and three steals, numbers she will look to build on. She also struggled to connect on her attempts from deep, going 1-4. The Massachusetts native will be a key factor in whether the Huskies win this year's championship and would benefit tremendously from a strong start.

The contest will tip off at 7 p.m. EST at the XL Center in downtown Hartford and can be viewed on SNY.
